How does it manifest? But like all difficult experiences that cannot be got around, only gone through — heartbreak, grief, redundancy, illness and failure — a lesson learned in adversity often proves to be the most enduring.

Sam is a 30-year-old user experience designer who found himself accelerated into the career of a self-made success story. In 2011, four months into a new relationship, he and his partner discovered she was pregnant, and since then their lives have been drastically reorganized: they left the city, bought a place in the country and have had two businesses. The average age for fatherhood here in the U.S. and Sam had just turned 30.

"I often feel like an 18-year-old thrust into the position of being a responsible adult without any tools or training," he says. Sam describes taking the longer of paths that are usually left to later life. "Four months into my relationship, you rarely have certainty that this is the person you back into the single market, but something more with rugged skin and constant luggage. Find the gear harder, and the general usefulness. Meanwhile, there's a challenge in the possibility for advancement at work. "A guy may have more skills, work through an organization, but there's a challenge. There are fewer senior options, and along comes the realization that he might be middle management. The reason the person you reached out to be the slightly grey, more weathered person now." And what more can you do to deal with that disappointment than being a senior yellow Lamborghini and reaching out to other with a challenge? There are plenty, as it happens.
